Business Card A business card (sometimes titled business card, meeting card, personal card or letterhead) is a card with space available to print or otherwise carry information about a person, business or other organization. The business card is common in many cultures and is the most basic printed item. In modern terminology, "business card" has a broader meaning than the "business card" of older times. While many business cards consist of a single sheet of paper, other cards may be much longer. Some business cards also include a calling card. Common sizes are A3 and 8.5×11 inches. Some business cards are standardized; for example, they may be printed on card stock with a professional-looking design printed by a specialist printer. History The business card has been printed in Asia, for centuries, and also known as a fan letter. In 1674, the Sexton's Map showed an invention for printing business cards. Europe The first printed business cards in Europe were made by hand and used for both sending a letter to someone and just as a memento. Some elaborate cards were made using engraving. The first business cards with a printed design were made in the 17th century. The first known business cards in Europe were made by hand and used for both sending a letter to someone and just as a memento. Some elaborate cards were made using engraving. In the 18th century, the engraving process was improved, making the printing of business cards more available. The business card was originally given away at meetings and fairs. Japan The first official business cards were made in Japan during the Edo period. A study on the making of business cards was made in 1733, by Tokuda Kisaburō, who used woodblock printing and illustrated card designs. The business cards were used for both sending a letter and as a memento. In the late 19th century, the "stickers and postcards" era began and became very popular. In
