Chlorophyllin Chlorophyllin is a green coloring matter found in green leafy vegetables such as spinach. It is made by the microbial conversion of chlorella (Chlorella vulgaris), a green microorganism found in soil that also produces large amounts of Vitamin B12 (as Chlorophyll), in addition to a variety of trace nutrients. The process begins by adding a base (trisodium citrate) to a suspension of Microalgae Chlorella. The solution is left to settle overnight. A large green layer forms on the top of the solution. To get rid of the floating cell bodies and other impurities, the green solution is decanted, filtered, and re-settled. The solution is then decanted again. The base and the green layer are discarded. The cells settled at the bottom of the solution are the red cells, and they are discarded. The mother liquid containing the remaining cell bodies is called the leach liquor. This is concentrated by boiling (boiling kills the microalga but leaves the chlorella). The solution is then cooled, filtered, and centrifuged. The solid is dried, ground, and allowed to settle out. The supernatant is discarded, and the solid is collected. This is called the chlorophyllin. Chlorophyllin is the base used in the manufacturing of green tea. It is used as a source of chlorophyll. Chemical structure Chlorophyllin consists of equimolecular amounts of pyridinium and amino acids (e.g. L-tyrosine and L-phenylalanine). The structure can be easily identified as a mixture of two pyridinium salts of tyrosine, L-tryptophan (tyramine), and cysteine. Uses Chlorophyllin can be used as a food dye, as it is an effective source of chlorophyll in the body. This lowers the need to ingest large amounts of this nutrient. Chlorophyllin is the original source of chlorophyll in all green tea products. It is highly stable and minimizes "astringent" properties caused by chlorophyllates. Chlorophyll is insoluble in cold water. This creates problems for shipping tea from the tea production areas to

This invention relates generally to a snow chain, and more particularly to a snow chain of the type used to connect the drive sprocket of an internal combustion engine to the driven sprocket of a bicycle or the like. In any such vehicle, the snow chain serves to transmit rotary motion from the engine to the bicycle, and particularly to the rear wheel thereof. Most snow chains are quite inefficient, in that the drive links and side bars of such chains are relatively thin, and therefore the drive or idler sprockets are quite large, in order to provide a sufficient number of teeth to carry a reasonable length of chain therearound. As a result, there is excessive wind resistance in the chain, and this is particularly undesirable for a bicycle, which is typically quite sensitive to any increased wind resistance. A snow chain of the type to which this invention is directed is generally elongate, and is provided with a central main body or tube therearound which houses the drive or idler sprocket. The central tube is generally of circular cross section and houses therearound a plurality of drive links, which define, or are attached to, a series of teeth. The drive links are usually provided with elongate holes, and the teeth are generally provided with sharpened tips, such that the teeth penetrate the links and drive them out of the central tube. A set of side bars are attached to the drive links, and are arranged generally at right angles to the drive links. The drive links extend generally from the center of the tube, and are fitted with hook-shaped ends which abut the side bars. The drive sprocket is connected to one end of the chain, and the driven sprocket is connected to the other end. The driven sprocket carries a chain drive means, such as a cable, to which the bicycle is to be tied. Because the drive links and side bars are formed in separate elements, it is necessary to connect them together. For this, the drive links are usually provided with a pair of spaced-apart connecting rods, each of which extends from an elongate aperture in one side of one of the drive links. The side bars are also provided with elongate apertures, and are held together by two connecting rods, each of which is received in a pair of such apertures. Thus, the drive and driven sprockets may be connected together with the side bars bridging the gaps between the pair of connecting rods on each side bar. An alternate form of snow chain is also known in which
