~ hand planted in a sunny area outside. Thankyou to all the Itevils and pests who have eaten my growth in the last year. The first-year seedlings will be transplanted in September. (Note the beautifully coloured flowers on the Crassula alata) Writing this blog is my way of sharing my love and thoughts about the remarkable plants that I have the good fortune to be able to grow in the garden and rock formations of my neighbourhood near Portland. I enjoy writing about gardening, vegetable-growing, plants, rock formations, their shapes and colours, and other interest areas in my life. I welcome your comments, and especially any questions that you might have. Click on the "read more" link to get started. September has arrived and the weather has been decent. There has been rain from time to time, but not yet as much as we usually have in Portland. (And the Chemise de Carmes continues, a blanket of white flowers - the first White Double daisies bloomed yesterday. Photo by Art Crawford) The seeds of Tithonia tubifolia, a pretty plant with lovely pink flowers have been planted. They are being protected now in a large black container. These are large plants. Here are the Oxalis violacea vines alongside the Tithonia tubifolia seedlings. A bunch of Portland artichokes are blooming: Thlaspi arvense, some of the flowers are in bloom and most of the plants are in full production. Several of the later transplants of Paris de Poitiers Roman peppers seem to be a little smaller than the pots they now occupy. (Above left) Tithonia tubifolia seedlings. (Above right) Oxalis violacea. The barren-looking leaves of Celosia argentea, which have a somewhat unpleasant texture and which I have had to remove from my beds to prevent them decaying, are growing very slowly. The smaller scarlet-headed Imperial Fleece silk, Chrysanthemum leucanthemum, has been flowering profusely for months now. The maroon-red flowers of Eupatorium maculatum perfoliatum are now in full production, and in the last few days the fringed fern Craspedia occidentalis has been putting out new leaves.
