Main 45 Comments for InboxArchiver I found a free program for this. It doesn't have a GUI but you can start it as a service from any program or any other way that makes sense. The name of the program is 'Online Email Archiver'. It's free and is compatible with several mail services like Gmail, Yahoo, Hotmail, AOL and others. I have no affiliation with the program or the developer. Just thought that someone else had the same idea. The web sites you mention all have their own schedule that gets over written when you send or receive e-mail. Yahoo lets you set multiple email accounts to be synced and organized. I am a big fan of Overstock because they are committed to customer service and support. I had the task of uploading old mails to my new iPhone. I am also pleased to see that I can download my old mails and exchange them with my desktop and iPhone accounts on Overstock. This software is not free for your liking. You need to download and install the MS Outlook Express and then update this tool. For $29.95 (with our auto license program), it is a bargain for the features, performance and good support from Martin Brothers, Inc. The best product for archiving online email is the Inbox Developer V6. [Archiver For Outlook Express] The 5-pack of the old version, which I use, is not a product at all. It is simply a standalone program, which you can use but it doesn't replace ESEARCH. But this is not the case with the new version. You are here on this page because you got a free version of InboxArchiver, and you are asking - can I buy this, use it, make money with it? The answer is Yes, and No. It is possible, and it is not possible, based on the license agreement you signed when you downloaded InboxArchiver. You signed an agreement which states you can use InboxArchiver for free and it can NOT be redistributed or sold. You can publish your software as freeware. You cannot sell it, or make any money with it. The program you are using is actually called 'Archiver For Outlook Express'. Archiver For Outlook Express is a freeware, and is a component of InboxArchiver. If the folks at MS Research & Development have been working on
