for a Day (Japan) Spaceships for a Day (often Japanese: (□□□□)SENDAI / □□□ GENSENDAI) is a special type of train reserved for emergency purposes on Japanese express trains. Usually an express train which goes through countryside areas, Spaceships are considered to be more comfortable and more attractive than normal express trains. They run until the last train to the destination station in the closing time. They are also allowed to pass through Namba interchange station because the train equipped with a parking lot at the middle of the express train. History Before the introduction of Shuttle type ("data train") in the late 1980s, the concept was pioneered by the now defunct Japanese National Railways (JR) ("green train") in 1954. Green train 1 for example was a regular commuter train for daily running, but in the event of unexpected emergency, it was assigned to a special route. The full configuration of the "green trains" 1-3 were as follows. Green Train Common passenger commuter train for local service runs on 6 types of routes, with,, or engines. Special Train (Green Train) Emergency train is dispatched when the common trains cannot fulfill the urgent, required train schedule. They are equipped with reserve crews to deal with the emergency quickly and safely. They are discontinued when the emergency has subsided. Red Train Common passenger express trains typically run at 100 km/h in local service. There are seven types of express trains (denoted with letter A to G) with trains of World Freight Express (D, D' and K), high-speed express trains (L and H), or in-door/out-door express trains (M and N). Train for overcoming a sudden disaster, such as earthquake or fire, or using emergency crews, is equipped with sealed "anti-terrorist" and evacuation cabs at the front and/or rear of the trains. Blue Train Reserved train for distinguished passengers such as internationally traveling guests, top athletes, musicians, actors, etc. Their speed is reduced to 85 km/h. Pink Train Special train for VIPs (including the top lawmakers) are dispatched to meet the high rank legislators to express their gratitude and encourage them on their upcoming assignments. Yellow Train Train for similar purpose to that of the blue train
