Patients with acute radiation sickness (ARS) are treated in the Department of Therapeutics and Radiological Protection of the Chernobyl Research Institute. Their treatment is based on clinical and laboratory data that were used in our first clinical trial. On these data, a score that reflects the degree of ARS severity was created; it was used to make the choice of the appropriate type of treatment. The index was based on the severity of symptoms (prediction of recovery, the effectiveness of treatment) and the time of treatment (number of days after the accident). A total of 400 patients with different levels of ARS were examined. The results of the first clinical trial indicated that the mean duration of ARS is significantly shorter in patients with severe forms of ARS than in those with mild ARS. On the basis of the developed score, the effectiveness of treatment was studied. A comparison of the efficacy of treatment in patients in the first and second clinical trials suggested a significant reduction in time of therapy. In the first clinical trial, the patients were treated with a combination of alkaline, iron, glutamine, and cell-stabilizing therapy; in the second, they were given monotherapy. The most effective monotherapy was alkaline treatment. The data obtained allowed the authors to recommend that patients with ca3bfb1094
