Our interest will be to relate the chemical and physical properties of membrane components to the organismic and physiological requirements of the system concerned, in order to determine the role of cell surface macromolecules in some of these processes. This work will involve studies on a number of different systems. First, we will study the properties of the Mac-2 binding proteins of mouse macrophages by amino acid, protein, and NMR structural analyses. The cell surface glycoprotein complex consisting of Mac-2 and NKR-P1, a p55 receptor involved in gamma-interferon killing, will also be studied using the techniques and techniques described for Mac-2. The alpha and beta chains of NKR-P1 will be isolated and studied biochemically and structurally. A previous study of the NKR-P1 has established its identity as a p55 receptor with a Mr of about 55,000. In addition, the extracellular domains of p55 will be characterized using monoclonal antibodies and by protein chemistry. These studies will provide information on the receptor as well as the amino acid sequence of NKR-P1. Finally, the association between cell surface fibronectin and NKR-P1 will be studied, especially in terms of the active incorporation of fibronectin into the NKR-P1 receptors. This will be studied using affinity labeled radiolabeled fibronectin and monoclonal antibodies to identify both the NKR-P1 receptor and the alpha chain of the receptor. to your own body, you are now allowed to kill other people. (Gen. 9:5-6) God will also punish the nations for their sin. (Gen. 9:7
