I have created some matrix data structures in code using the `__m128` class. I have noticed that the data I create is over 8 GB and so the resulting object size is over the 64GB boundary. I need to call a function in the code that works with matrix data of various sizes, and so I have to truncate the data. I am aware of the bitwise operation, `(double) (__m128d) y;` to obtain the truncated data, but how do I truncate from the beginning of the `__m128`? PS - One issue I do have is that I am calling this function from another thread, which could potentially clobber the data as it is truncated/modified. A: If you have a x64 processor, you can use 64bit data elements. The Pentium 4 is not 64bit, the Pentium II was. For a C++ compiler, you should use the `static_cast` operator. But I don't know if you can transfer the data via a `dynamic_cast` operator. Q: How do I resolve a path to filepath(Path): An object cannot be passed as an argument to itself? My picture, which is set to a FileStream works perfectly in the console application using the following code:
`File.ReadAllBytes(filepath);` The problem comes when I try to migrate to Windows Forms. In the desktop form I am getting the following error: "An object cannot be passed as an argument to itself." I use this code to read the picture:
`pictureBox1.Image = Image.FromFile(filepath);` I have also tried, changing the filepath to a Stream, a String, a byte[
