The present invention relates to an electrical connector, and more particularly to an electrical connector having a rubber socket to protect against positive external ESD. Electrical connectors having a contact portion contacting with a complementary contact portion of a mating connector to connect the two connectors are widely used in the field of modern information industry, for instance, electrical connectors used as an interface between IC cards and card readers. High speed signals often suffer from several problems caused by electrical connections between a signal conductor and a mating connector. For instance, positive electrostatic discharge (hereinafter, referred to as ESD) can cause the signal to undergo an irreversible change, causing a failure in the electrical connection. FIG. 1 is a schematic diagram of a conventional electrical connector, and FIG. 2 is an exploded perspective view of the connector. The connector of FIG. 1 has a housing 50, a plurality of contacts 52 and 53 attached to the housing 50, a number of retention members 54 disposed at the housing 50 corresponding to each contact 52 and 53 and a rubber socket 55 coupled with the housing 50 by means of the retention members 54. The housing 50 has a base 51, a bottom plate 52, a pair of side plates 53, two ends 54 and a plurality of guiding slots 55. The base 51 has a front end for a complementary connector and a back end for a circuit board. The bottom plate 52 and the side plates 53 are disposed on the front end of the base 51 and extend forward from the front end, the side plates 53 disposed on the front end of 6d1f23a050
